Those old sailors who can still remember that old chanty and the good old days of the American clipper ships smile at the occasional reports of 'record-breaking" passages by sailing ships of these days and wonder why the people who make the big claims don't study the history of ocean sailing and find some facts that ought to be well known among those who handle ship news. A notable instance of mistaken claims of latter day speed is the report published not long ago to the effect that the "clipper" ship Erskine M. There is no authentic record extant of her performances prior to 1851, in which she made the run referred to. It was on a passage from New York to San Francisco, covering a distance of 13,610 miles and consuming, 89 days and 18 hours. Such passages make the blood tingle when the meaning is understood.

Homeward or outward bound, it was all the same, canvas and more canvas and all hands standing by, waiting for something to part company. It may have been reckless work, according to the ideas of owners and masters of today, but the thoroughbreds were built for it.
